Kathryn Mulderink : The Stations of the Cross: an adult coloring book before purchasing it in order to gage whether or not it would be worth my time, and all praised The Stations of the Cross: an adult coloring book:

A Faith-filled Coloring Book for Adults (and Older Kids, Too)By Laura PearlOne book that I've been enjoying lately is neither non-fiction nor fiction; actually, it's a coloring book. And it's not just for kids, either. This coloring book was, as a matter of fact, created with adults in mind. Cheryl Dickow, president of Bezalel Books, very generously sent me a copy of the company's recently published "The Stations of the Cross, an adult coloring book," by Kathryn Mulderink, OCDS (with illustrations by Father Victor KyNam), in exchange for an honest review. And I can say in all honesty that I think it's a winner. Adult coloring books like this one appear to be a popular trend nowadays; in fact, I've seen racks of them all over the place--not only at bookstores, but at Walmart, Michael's, and even Bed, Bath, Beyond. I think adult coloring books are to the new millennium what paint-by-numbers kits were to the 1950's. Putting a Catholic spin on a popular trend is something that Cheryl Dickow does very well, employing her proudly Catholic company as a tool to evangelize this beautiful Faith. Bezalel's adult coloring book is filled with masterfully and tenderly rendered illustrations of the 14 Stations of the Cross, each with a coordinating scripture passage and prayer. As I was contentedly coloring the illustration for the Fourth Station, "Jesus Meets His Mother," while simultaneously meditating about Our Lord's Passion, I was struck by how perfect an educational tool this would be for Catholic homeschooling families. It combines an art lesson with a religion lesson seamlessly. Get this book for your homeschool book shelf. Or just get it for yourself, so that when life's pressures get to you, you can find peace as you create art that will feed your soul.

Surrender to the feelings of love and gratitude found in contemplating and coloring these beautiful Stations of the Cross renderings by Father Victor KyNam. Accompanied by Scripture and prayers written by Kathryn Mulderink, OCDS, The Stations of the Cross: an adult coloring book is truly a transformative experience.
