Author/archaeologist James Cunkle has created a user-friendly guide to the identification and classification of the many types of pottery created by prehistoric people of the Southwest. This guide takes you back through pre-history, explaining not only what the pottery looked like, but how it was made, how it was used and what may have happened to the artisans who crafted these remarkable treasures.

About the AuthorJames Cunkle and his colleagues are currently working on Raven Site Ruins in northeaster Arizona at the base of the White Mountains, twelve miles north of Springerville. The site has provided the majority of the data which encompass this work. As Coordinator and Director of Research, Kunkle, along with his wife, Carol, operate the Center, a facility open to the general public and devoted to preserving, protecting and discovering the past through education and a hands-on exposure to field archaeology.
